AS GROVER WOULD HAVE IT.

The New York Sun has submitted a draft of a constitution which is designed to fit the Cleveland administration. Harmony between the Executive of a country and its organic law being an essential condition to efficient government, and Mr. Cleveland having evidently conceived a prejudice against our present constitution, something has to be done. The Sun's constitution is short and to the point. Following is all that has at the present time been submitted:

THE REVISED CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE II—SECTION I.

1. The executive and legislative power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

2. The President shall have power, without the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint Commissioners Paramount.

3. He shall from time to time conceal from the Congress information of the state of foreign countries.

4. He shall guarantee a monarchical form of government everywhere.

5. He shall have power to make war without previous notice to the enemy or to his own subjects.

The combination of the executive and legislative power in the President may be considered a happy thought. It will save friction. There will be no conflict between the two powers. If this proposed constitution had been in force in March a simple proclamation declaring the silver purchasing clause in the Sherman act repealed would have accomplished the work Congress sweated over during the dog days. The President might declare enacted the tariff bill the Ways and Means Committee has prepared and which Congress is quite likely to reject.

The second clause, relating to the treaty power, would, if at present in force, save the President much worry. It is true he exercised the power to appoint a Commissioner Paramount, but that exercise of power is likely to prove a kind of Banquo's ghost, which will not down at the President's bidding. An inquisitive Congress may want to know where he found the power to supersede a full-fledged minister with a personal agent, even if he invested the agent with paramount power.

The power granted by the third clause in the proposed constitution has also been assumed under our present constitution. Congress never get a hint from the President as to what was going on at the Hawaiian Islands during the summer. Information of the state of foreign governments certainly could not be more effectively concealed under the proposed constitution than has been the case since the President's second term began.

The fourth clause is mandatory. It does not give the President the power to exercise discretion. It is true the result would be the same as long as Mr. Cleveland may be President, but when we have to deal with an obstinate man, care should be taken not to stimulate his combative organs. The fourth clause should read: The President should have power to guarantee a monarchical form of government everywhere.

The fifth clause is more judicious. It says the President should have power to make war, and relieves him from any obligation to let either his enemy or his subjects know what he proposes to do. This will suit Grover to a dot. He does not like being questioned by an authority that can enforce an answer.

A sixth clause might be added to the Sun's constitution worded somewhat as follows:

The President shall rule as long as he lives, and shall live forever.
